

Sprint 1 Review

We successfully came up with a unique idea for our project and met up to discuss what we were going to accomplish throughout the week. After collaborating on our idea and building onto it, we created an outline for our presentation. Ensuring our presentation met guidelines was one of our main goals along with effectively creating a convincing concept that would not only be appealing to our target audience, but most importantly, to our client. After solidifying our vision, we set on creating an outline of our presentation and script. It was essential for our presentation to be limited to five slides while being no longer than five minutes. It also had to include the introduction of the team, problem, proposed solution, target audience, team overview, feasibility, and a call to action. As a team, we ran into many problems while recording our pitch. Cramming all that information into five minutes proved to be harder than we thought. After shortening the script and talking a little faster, we managed to successfully present our pitch in four minutes and 52 seconds.

Because we only had about a week to complete this assignment, we inevitably ran into many problems. We had to rush a lot of the work while trying to keep up with the quality. When trying to have our first meeting, we ran into our first problem—meeting up. It was challenging to get our whole team together for one meeting, so we had to adapt and work in sections. On our first meeting, out of five people, only three were able to find time to meet up. To fix this, we started communicating not only in person, but also by texting and meeting online. Throughout the project, the biggest obstacle we faced was finding enough time to work on the project together. Everyone had different availability making it difficult to work on the project at once. To solve this, we had to distribute and assign tasks across the group. Doing this not only helped in finishing the project on time, but it also ensured everyone was a part of it and had worked on it. As a team, we had difficulty understanding what our client wanted. So, we communicated with him to get an idea of what he was expecting. After communicating with him, we misunderstood his expectations and thought he wanted us to just throw our idea in.

Unexpectedly, our client was not attracted to our pitch at all. While he did like our communication, organization, compliance with instructions, professionalism, and persuasiveness, he felt our idea was too generic, needed more depth, and our delivery plan was not solid enough. Our idea was to create an outfit planner that helped others plan, donate, and keep track of outfits. We did not expand on the features and lacked details like how they would work and what level of user input they require. We also failed to explain how we would create the web application. Our pitch failed to elaborate how the application would store, process, and evaluate data. All in all, it was missing many aspects that could've greatly improved our project pitch.
